

VIDEO – RSE Report into Digital Participation

The new report issued today by the Royal Society of Edinburgh into digital participation says that the step change proposed by the Scottish Government needs to step up a gear.

They conclude that the government will have to spend £100m to ensure that there is no widening of the digital divide across the country, but that the divide is not all about geography.

We spoke to the chair of the RSE Inquiry, Professor Alan Fourman about the findings

You can download the report here.