

Edinburgh Festival Fringe 2015 REVIEW: Every Brilliant Thing *****

A play about suicide attempts and depression could be fairly dark and sad but this is an hour spent in the company of a delightful performer that celebrates 'every brilliant thing' about life and makes us all think about the small things that create a rich and happy life.

Some of the list is distributed to members of the audience before the show starts and there are some great moments of audience participation. So successful were they that it made me think some were plants!

Everyone who took part gave 100% and a brushed away a tear or two among lots of smiles.

A truly enjoyable piece of self confessional theatre that sets the bar high.
