

HERBERT – the answer to all our public transport woes?

by our roving reporter Garth Bryans.

Hendrick's have taken on the challenge of addressing the poor standards and etiquette on public transport.

After years of tireless work Hendrick's Ministry for Marginally Superior Transport have come up with a vision for mass transportation of Edinburgh residents.

This vision was unveiled on the streets of Edinburgh this week, cunningly disguised as a giant cucumber.

Hendrick's Extraordinary Roving Bus for Exceptionally Refined Travel (HERBERT) has been showcasing what public transport should be like.

This is a vision of travelling in the refined comfort of a stately house, with poetry, cucumber sandwiches and of course plenty of gin.

I think we can all agree this would make the morning commute much more interesting. I hope that Lothian Buses are studying this prototype cucumber carefully, although as yet no plans have been announced to start the service on the morning commute.

Hendricks Gin Bus arrives in Edinburgh.

For the time being those who share in the vision of a marginally superior form of transport will be able to join in the fun by boarding the bus at Bramble Cocktail Bar on Queen Street. Tickets are free here but there is a £2.50 admin charge. H.E.R.B.E.R.T. runs around the city from 16:00 to 21:00

Follow @HendricksGinUk and use the hashtag #HendricksMinistry
The best or worst tweets will perhaps receive a delightfully different Hendrick's gift or a personalised message from the Ministry.