

Edinburgh software firm expands with new appointment

The Edinburgh software firm Scott Logic has appointed a Glaswegian to a senior role!

Glaswegian Philip Pinkowski graduated from the University of Glasgow in computing science in 2009 moved to Edinburgh and has never left.

Phillip explained: “I previously worked for Weatherford, an oil and gas service company, mainly using .NET technologies with some newer HTML5 and Angular experience.

“I came across Scott Logic when I was looking for an opportunity to improve my skills and branch into other technologies and industries. I had heard good things about working at Scott Logic and its progressive attitude towards using new technologies and helping staff to develop skills, along with striving to develop high quality software.

“The move from long term product work to the varied work of client projects really appealed to me, and since starting I’ve met loads of new people. I’ve also had the opportunity to begin learning some new web technologies and I’m excited for the challenges ahead, working on interesting client projects.”

Scott Logic’s Head of Development in Edinburgh, Murray Crease, added: “It’s great to welcome another talented individual to augment our software consultancy team.

“I’m really looking forward to working closely with Phillip and seeing him develop on client projects.”
