

Local Edinburgh author releases political thriller

Local author Katy Moran has released a new political thriller, Project Nova.

Jamie Jameson, a young, disgraced political journalist, stumbles into the web of a government conspiracy after witnessing a suicide.

In a world where everyone is tracked and monitored, and few options for help, Jamie seeks out her estranged ex-partner and technology expert, Jack. Together they uncover a startling design exposing a new application of quantum computing that, in the wrong hands, could sever the delicately laced strings of reality. With increasingly strange events transpiring, Jamie must open old wounds to untangle the mysteries she has uncovered.

The novel deals with the future of government controlled Artificial Intelligence and the effects that it could have on society.

This is Moran's first novel and is published by Integral Fiction.
