

New building at the Royal Highland Centre will be ready for next year

The new mixed-use building at the Royal Highland Centre in Ingliston will be ready next year, and a topping out ceremony was held to mark its progress.

Robertson is building the £4.8m event space for the Royal Highland and Agricultural Society of Scotland (RHASS), a membership organisation which runs the Royal Highland Show. The 179th show which is the biggest event held at the showground began today

Robertsons – Ingliston Stock.
Ingliston, Edinburgh, Midlothian, UK.
19/06/2019.
Pic shows:

Credit: Ian Jacobs

Featuring around 18,800 sq. ft. of flexible space, the new facility will give RHASS the ability to accommodate conferences and meetings. In addition, a raised viewing gallery will offer enhanced views over the main show arena.

David Cairns, Managing Director, Robertson Central East, said: "With this year's Royal Highland Show just getting underway, it's particularly fitting that we're celebrating a key milestone on a project which will greatly enhance the venue in the years ahead.

"Since beginning work in February of this year we have made significant progress and are on track to hand over the building next spring. The new pavilion is at the centre of RHASS' plans to develop The Royal Highland Centre and it will play a key role in catering for increased demand."

The Royal Highland Centre is Scotland's largest indoor and outdoor venue, attracting over one million visitors each year to more than 200 events.

The new pavilion is one of a number of projects being delivered in the Edinburgh region by Robertson, who have a regional office in nearby Ratho. Current projects include the redevelopment of Raeburn Place, the sports ground which hosted the world's first international rugby match, and the refurbishment of 10 George Street.

Robertsons – Ingliston Stock.
Ingliston, Edinburgh, Midlothian, UK.
19/06/2019.
Pic shows:

Credit: Ian Jacobs