

Friends of the Earth support extension to bus lane hours in Edinburgh.

Environmental campaigners have urged Edinburgh residents to support extension to bus lanes operating hours, as the Council consults on the move.

Friends of the Earth Scotland say that expanding Edinburgh's bus lanes is key to improving air quality, and reducing climate emissions.

The City of Edinburgh Council has proposed changing the operating hours of bus lanes, from peak time on weekdays, to 7.00am to 7.00 pm seven days a week. This largely reverses a decision made by the council in 2015 to restrict the operating hours.

Campaigners says the further prioritisation of public transport would be in line with recent council commitments to reach net zero climate emissions by 2030 and the council's City Centre Transformation project which aims to reduce traffic and create a city centre built for people, not cars.

Friends of the Earth Scotland's Air Pollution Campaigner Gavin Thomson commented: "The proposed expansion of bus lane operating hours would be a great step forward for Edinburgh, as the city tries to leave behind a car dominated transport system which is killing the planet and choking our lungs. It could end the frustrations of bus users who see their journey congested and slowed up by lines of cars with only one person in each."

“The expansion to 7-7-7, from 7am to 7pm seven days a week, is a clear statement that public transport needs to be prioritised in Edinburgh. The operating hours for Edinburgh’s lanes should never have been restricted to peak times, so it is good to see that backwards step being corrected. I hope everyone in Edinburgh who wants to live and work in a safer, healthier city will support this move.

“We need to see these moves supported at the Scottish Government level. Bus lanes in cities also need to connect to bus lanes on motorways, to ensure inter-city bus travel is a cheaper, easier option. Given the climate emergency, we need national government and councils to move quickly in establishing the priority of public transport, walking, and cycling”.

© Martin McAdam

Lothian Buses Photo: www.martinmcadam.com