

Ruxton true crime thriller could be heading for television screens

Author and retired police chief Tom Wood's book on a barbaric murder which shocked the nation is to be made into a podcast and could be heading for a limited television series.

Ruxton: The First Modern Murder is said to be the case which laid down the foundations for forensic science which to this day still influence police investigations around the world.

The book, published by Ringwood Publishing, has been snapped up by US multimedia production company Paperclip who are to produce an unscripted podcast and limited scripted (television) series.

Evil killer Dr Buck Ruxton who met his end on the gallows for the brutal murder of his wife and her maid

Paperclip was founded by actress Yeardley Smith – the voice of The Simpsons middle daughter Lisa – and film producer Ben Cornwall, and whose flagship true-crime podcast Small Town Dicks, about big time crime in small town America, nets 1 million downloads per month.

Smith and Cornwall will executive-produce the podcast with the former Depute Chief Constable of Lothian and Borders Police, whose other books include the infamous World's End Murders.

Yeadley Smith said: “Tom is a master storyteller and with Ruxton he’s deftly made the history of modern forensics read like a true-crime thriller. I can’t wait for audiences to hear the podcast.”

Tom Wood added: “I am delighted to be working with Yeadley, Ben and the team at Paperclip in the development of Ruxton. This is an important story which it has been my privilege to tell. It deserves the widest audience, and a podcast with the team that brought the world Small Town Dicks is a great place to start.”

Victim Isabella Ruxton whose body parts were found strewn around a Borders beauty spot

Only the brilliance of Scottish scientists and determined police officers brought Ruxton to trial and led him to the gallows in a case which established many ground-breaking forensic techniques which are still in common use today in criminal investigations,
