

Ingliston rave – licence refused

A huge nineties style rave planned at Ingliston next month is set to be cancelled after the council refused to grant a licence over concerns about drugs.

The police objected to the “high risk” dance music event going ahead at the Royal Highland Centre where previous shows have resulted in many people being taken to hospital and arrests.

One councillor said she was worried about the volume of incidents in the past, adding it is “our duty to ensure public safety”.

It comes less than a month after 19 year-old Maya Nager died after collapsing at the Terminal V music festival also hosted at Ingliston. Police Scotland said they are still investigating the circumstances of the teenager’s death.

Supported by all but one member of The City of Edinburgh Council’s licensing sub-committee, the decision not to approve a licence has thrown the organisers’ plans into chaos – and is likely to force them to refund thousands of tickets, which have been on sale since September.

The over-18s ‘festive extravaganza’ was planned for 3 December and advertised a packed line-up including Vengaboys, TTF, DJ Sammy and Ultrabeat.

Organisers TF Events and Highland Centre Ltd said ‘additional measures’ were planned to curb any drug misuse and dealing, such as increased numbers of stewards and medical staff and more stringent searches on entry.

Police say too many drug-related incidents at previous event

However, PC Greig Stephen from the Edinburgh Police Division said there have been too many drug-related incidents at the Royal Highland Centre (RHC) previously to justify another rave.

Speaking at the meeting on Monday he reported that public safety officers said the 5,000-capacity event would be similar to the 'Ultimate 90's Rave' held at the RHC in April which was marred by drugs and criminality.

"At that specific event, which was a similar capacity to what's being proposed today, there were 23 medical cases, one of which was taken to hospital for drug-related concerns and one of these medical cases was a 16 year-old having consumed ecstasy," he said.

"There were 73 positive drug searches, the majority for cocaine, cannabis and ecstasy and welfare providers assisted 65 people, mostly with drug and alcohol intoxication, there were also three arrests made for crime and disorder."

Earlier this year he warned the committee against granting another license for Terminal V, telling councillors attendees have ended up in intensive care and placed in medically induced comas overnight as a result of drug overdoses, whilst hundreds were arrested for supplying or possessing narcotics.

Responding to the organisers' pledge to go 'above and beyond' to mitigate anyone coming to harm, Councillor Cathy Fullerton said: "Why has it taken you so long to up your game in respect of drug awareness and stewarding?"

“If you look at the catalogue of previous events, going above any beyond was maybe appropriate then as well.”

Cllr Fullerton added: “I’m still concerned about the drug-related incidents at previous events and I note the last one at Terminal V has not been recorded yet.

“Regardless of the age profile, whether it will be higher or not, I do not think the committee should be granting this application. It’s our duty to ensure public safety and with the record of previous events we have before us public safety must surely be at risk.”
