

Birmingham:

Attractions

Tourist

It's an incredibly young city with a very pleasant climate. This city is located in the UK, a country with an incredibly deep and sometimes mysterious history. A city that was invisible among others, but which showed its character during the industrial revolution that emerged. So, in order not to waste time and finally lift the veil of secrecy, today we are talking about the city of Birmingham and its attractions.

The heart of the West Midlands, Birmingham is the second-largest metropolis in the United Kingdom. Unfortunately, the traditional city core sustained significant damage during World War II, and contemporary construction has significantly altered the look of the city. However, it is the city's significant manufacturing past and lengthy history that draw visitors.

Birmingham has a major airport that connects it to major cities in Europe and some cities in North America. Mentioning the necessity of getting ready for the journey in advance will not be unnecessary. Reserve all required services in preparation. Among them is an airport transfer or a taxi to Birmingham airport. You won't have to worry about lines, protracted order wait periods, car or delivery location force majeure when you book AtoB airport transfer services. There is no danger of being late for crucial appointments using a Birmingham airport taxi. Time is money.

Birmingham Canal

Due to its geographical location, the city did not have access to large amounts of water. That's why its development was slowed down compared to other twin cities. But when the Age of Machines began, large factories began to form, and resources needed to be moved quickly and easily between different enterprises. The canals that were built during the Industrial Revolution came to help solve this problem.

These artificial canals are even longer than the world-famous canals of Venice. The oldest canals date back to the 18th century. It is these canals that set the flavour of the cities with small bridges that go from one street to another. Book the Birmingham airport taxi, arrive here and compare it with the Venice canals.

Jewellery Quarter

Talking about the canals, it is worth paying attention and looking into a rather interesting quarter that is precious in itself, but its story is no less precious. It was in this quarter that jewellery art developed and eventually spread to other cities. Several schools of jewellery art were formed in this place with their own philosophy and their own sense of the heartbeat of jewellery.

Each workshop tried to have its own recognisable style and surprise its customers with exquisite pieces. Even now, this cultural heritage and these ancient traditions are still alive and well within the walls of the Jewellers' Museum which can be reached by AtoBairport taxi. The collections will allow you to plunge into the 18th century as if in a time machine and feel yourself in a functioning jewellery workshop, waiting for a new discerning customer to come in and be surprised by a new work of jewellery art.

Birmingham Town Hall

Staying in this English city for a while, you can be transported somewhere in Rome. This feeling arises because of the incredible beauty of the city hall, which, by the intersection of its architectural lines, intertwines them into something monolithic, giving you the feeling that you are in ancient Rome. It is by looking at the town hall and ignoring the noise from the crowd of tourists that you can be caught for a moment thinking that some famous figure from ancient Rome, such as Julius Caesar, will pass by. But it's just a small spot in the heart of the UK where you should go by airport taxi, or maybe a time machine.

Science Museum

The city, which “exploded” in its development thanks to the Age of Machines, has absorbed this part of history and keeps it in the form of exhibits in the museum. The most interesting thing about this collection is that it has a fairly large number of different devices and machines from the Industrial Revolution. The most fascinating thing is that there are both steam engines and more engineering-heavy machines, as well as entire industrial equipment.

The collections also have steam engines of tractors and locomotives. In this museum, after coming here by AtoB airport transfer you will not only be able to see the birth of the Age of Industry in its detail with your own eyes but also have the opportunity to touch it thanks to the professional work of the guides who will move you like magicians in space and time and you will feel that it is not 2023.

National Sea Life Centre

The city still opened an aquatic life museum despite not having direct access to the large body of water. With its interesting architecture and quite fascinating engineering ideas, it will certainly take your breath away. The centre itself has many varieties of marine life within its walls that will be happy to show you themselves. An engineering idea that will allow you to get as close as possible to their sphere of life is a glass tunnel surrounded by water on all sides.

It's an incredibly exciting experience when a penguin swims over your head and stops for a minute to look at you, and a few metres away several jellyfish swim slowly and unhurriedly as if they are having a relaxed conversation about the meaning of life. After getting to this sea life centre by AtoB airport transfer such a moment makes some adults feel like children. The laughter, surprise and sincere emotions that marine life evokes during your journey through this tunnel will stay with you forever.
