

Five things you need to know today

A weekend is a long time in politics

This has been an important weekend in Scottish politics, but for all the wrong reasons. The SNP which has led the government for decades appears to be crumbling under the pressure of the leadership election, but mostly as a result of errors of its own making.

When Nicola Sturgeon announced her intention to resign, there was little or no idea of who would replace her. No obvious succession plans had been put in place as there was when Ms Sturgeon became First Minister in 2014.

Now there are three candidates, Humza Yousaf, Kate Forbes and Ash Regan, and voting opened last Monday. The SNP run the election and the announcement of the new leader is expected next Monday.

It became apparent that SNP HQ had not accurately reported the number of members who would be entitled to cast their vote. The numbers were out by around 30,000. Kate Forbes and Ash Regan demanded the correct numbers were published. It is widely considered that a lower number of SNP members probably favours the continuity candidate, Humza Yousaf.

Media boss, Murray Foote, was first to quit explaining that he now knew he had passed on the information he was given by HQ, but it was apparent the information was incorrect. That was Friday.

Then on Saturday it was the turn of Peter Murrell who had two jobs, one as the SNP Chief Executive Officer, and the other as First Husband. He announced his resignation from high office in the SNP on Saturday, in the face of a vote of no confidence which was considered a done deal.

Michael Russell SNP President and former Chief Executive has stepped into the breach running the party on a meanwhile basis.

Does this affect the voting or the outcome? Of course it does. It just depends where you are looking at it from as to whether it is a good or a bad thing. So even next Monday (if the voting continues this week) the result may be questioned by the unsuccessful candidates.

This story will continue but meantime catch up with the weekend's comings and goings here.

Scots Russians commemorate war dead and call for an end to conflict

By PHYLLIS STEPHEN

THE RUSSIAN invasion of Ukraine has entered its second year. The one year anniversary was marked with wreath laying at the National War Museum at Edinburgh Castle and a number of other events, both joyful and reflective, involving the Ukrainian people who live in Scotland. Some lived here already and thousands of others have made their way to Scotland to escape the war zone. Russians who oppose the war are very brave to speak out.

We met a small group, who live mainly in Scotland, and who had gathered outside the Russian Consulate on Melville Street to come together and talk of their experiences, and remember people who have died in Ukraine in the past year.

The group hung posters of images of people who have died in the war. These were created by a Russian born artist known as Instagram Nick, and represents only a small number of the innocent lives lost in the past twelve months.

New restaurant opening in Stockbridge

Chef patron duo Tomás Gormley and Sam Yorke

It used to be that new restaurant openings were ten a penny in Edinburgh. Now those brave souls who put their money where their mouth is to open new ventures depending on passing trade and word of mouth recommendations are to be commended for their bravery.

Chef patron duo Tomás Gormley and Sam Yorke, have just opened their second restaurant, Skua, in Edinburgh on Thursday. The founders of the acclaimed Heron in Leith have brought together a menu of small plates inspired by the seasons.
