

Recruitment begins at Scotland's first inland surf complex

The first inland surf resort in Scotland begins its recruitment drive ahead of its September launch in Edinburgh.

Lost Shore Surf Resort will be looking for individuals to fill roles in their surfing team, such as surfing instructors and lifeguards.

The company has said that the company will pay up to £12.74 per hour which is just a little more than the Real Living Wage.

The complex, which is located ten minutes from Edinburgh Airport, will also require therapists and people working in hospitality, maintenance, landscaping, marketing, security and visitor experience.

While the resort does not open until September, many of the roles will have an earlier start date.

Andy Roger, CEO of Lost Shore Surf Resort, said: "Lost Shore Surf Resort is going to make a huge splash when we open in September. Being a Living Wage Employer we are committed to building a fantastic team to help us deliver our vision for Lost Shore Surf Resort.

"The opening of any new business is an exciting moment. The build up to the first day is part of that journey with the new team learning about the resort and becoming well placed to deliver for our visitors from the day we open.

“We have a number of dream roles for those who love surfing, but you don’t have to surf to work for us. We have lots of different roles available and we are looking for passionate and motivated individuals who will be excited to be part of one of the most unique openings anywhere in the world this year and thrive in a diverse and inclusive work environment. If you think that is you then please get in touch.”

Apply here: <https://www.lostshore.com/careers>

Artist's impression of what Lost Shore Surf Resort will look like when it opens in September 2024.